Overview Lost in the City was recorded over a period of two years in a variety of locations across the United States. It features collaborations with a variety of musicians, including Albert Lee, Bruce Hornsby, Guy Davis, Jerry Douglas, Craig Soderberg, and Sylvia Tyson. Pikelny described the album as "a transitional record. I've been writing songs on the road for years, and I haven't felt the urge to make a record for a while. This is the record I finally feel the need to write on." He added: "I feel more comfortable in the studio than I do writing songs by myself at home, and I've also been working more on the road, which has been rejuvenating". He noted that one of the album's major inspirations came from Jerry Douglas' album, "I Got Stung" (2009), released on Relix Records: "I had heard a good amount of it by the time I went back to where I was living in New York, and was inspired by it a lot. I wasn't trying to listen to it, but it just came up. I think that record for me was a model for the kind of music that I wanted to make. I want to have these little excursions from my own music that aren't just going to be all songs about traveling. I'd love to make records like that someday." Release and reception Release The album was released on April 12, 2010. Critical reception Jeffrey B. Renz of Outburn praised the album, praising Pikelny's "musical journey through American culture and history" and "host of inspired, cinematic, and harrowing" songs, writing that "Lost in the City is a set of journeys, the finest of which is Noam Pikelny's career-long journeys through American folklore.
